Global Overview:

United States:

The US market closed higher, led by Facebook, Apple and Amazon. The Federal Reserve is expected to leave loan costs unchanged for the two-day meeting starting on Tuesday, where it is also expected that the promise of "patient" will be removed when taking future rate measures, opening the possibility of a possible cut in his next minutes. Currently, federal funds rates are established in a range of 2.25%-2.50%. Additionally, new economic projections and direct information on how deeply politicians have been influenced by the US-China trade war and weaker economic data will be mentioned. In other news, a private indicator of housing sentiment in the US fell in June, leaving its six-month high due to rising construction costs and commercial worries offsetting the drop-in mortgage rates. On the other hand, Iran announced that it will soon violate the limits of the amount of enriched uranium it can store under an international pact of 2015 after Donald Trump announced that Washington was withdrawing from the nuclear agreement, increasing tensions between the two countries. Regarding commodities, oil prices fell more than 1% after poorer Chinese economic figures stoked fears of lower world oil demand.

Europe:

European markets closed the day down, awaiting further signals on the behavior of the Fed in relation to the interest rate. The pan-European index STOXX 600 (-0.1%), affected by the cut in the profit projections of the airline Lufthansa (-11.62%), due to lower gross margins associated with a war between airlines by market share and higher costs of oil prices, also, this fall dragged other companies in the sector, such as International Consolidated Airlines (-2.2%) or Ryanair Holdings (-4.39%). Sectorally, the banking sector obtained neutral returns, with HSBC (+ 0.9%) rising after it reported that it opened a new location in California, which is aimed at increasing its business in the US by 25%. Deutsche Bank (+ 1.40%) had a positive performance in reporting that it plans to create a special bank for the management of its non-operating assets, in an effort to become more profitable, while closing some subsidiaries outside Europe. Finally, Nordea Bank fell 1.7% after the Danish justice leveled its main headquarters under an investigation for money laundering.

Asia:

The Asian market closed with mixed results after a meeting of the Federal Reserve of the United States that will take place later in the week in the United States. In China, both composite indices ended with different results: Shanghai Composite (+ 0.20%) ended up, while Shenzhen Composite (-0.20%) ended the day down. On the other hand, in Hong Kong, the Hang Seng rose (+0.40%) on a day after large crowds gathered to demand that the city's top official retire after she suspended a controversial extradition bill. In Japan, the Nikkei 225 (+0.03%) in Japan closed just above the flat line, while the Topix fell (-0.45%). Among the main shares, Apple's supplier, Japan Display (-7.02%), collapsed after the company's announcement that Taiwanese flat panel manufacturer JPK Holding had decided not to invest in it. In other news, data published last Friday showed that China's industrial production growth in May slowed to a minimum of more than 17 years, much below expectations.
